

KEVIN HEATON

Mississippi Crossing

I rise from black dirt, reconciled to mallows slaked in deep swallowtail kisses, fretting blues riffs to lick the fog from off the levee. My yang for this place is the yin in its ground, the stock and staple of my talk. Its outcroppings, more earthy than hallowed, hitched to walking plow calluses too poor to miss depressions.

And yet, a provender of sorts: an olio of King Biscuit Flour, lard corn dodgers, and loose leaf tobacco twist doled out to mildewed gunny sacks, hung on half-crushed millstones to never dry.

There's a jubilee here that began as a prayer where humid evenings come to listen. More refrain than spirit at first, but even so, a voice: one that would free the Delta from herself, and reclaim her with a psalm—a hymn, in a tongue for every color, distant but resounding. Own-rolled, scored with folklore and cipherings, grist to mill and list into river bottom dusters, dis privies with old chamber pots, and bury company store tokens in dandelion tumbledowns still cottoning to rebel ordnance. Pawned to one-armed bandits in sundering Woolworth parishes.

Cyclones that began as gusts with gales of their own, fanning seed for more flowers—boasting blossoms much too handsome to heart half bloomed.
